Beware of job fraud!

Learn the red flags to look out for in your job search.

They're asking you to shop for them.
A position in which you are offered income in exchange for the use of your bank account. Typically, you are asked to deposit a check (sometimes for thousands of dollars) and then purchase gift cards and other items, keeping a portion for yourself.

You have to send them money.
Be wary if a potential employer asks you to send them payments by wire transfer or cashier’s check.

The job sounds too good to be true.
Be skeptical if a potential employer offers a large salary for very little work — especially those that promise thousands of dollars of income per month with little or no experience required.

They won't meet you in person.
Make sure it's some face-to-face interaction with the hiring manager and that communication is not done solely over phone or email before accepting the job.

You can't verify their information.
Google the employer to see if an active webpage exists. Make sure your contact’s email uses a company domain, not a personal domain like Gmail. If still in doubt, call the contact number on the main company number. If unable to speak directly to contact, do not proceed in applying.

They are asking for personal information.
While it’s standard to share your full name and contact information with a potential employer, be wary if asked to give credit card, bank account, driver’s license, passport or birth certificate information before you are hired.

The job they offer isn’t the one you applied for.
Be wary if a company posts a position and then changes it to something else when they contact you.

You'll be working from home.
While there are legitimate opportunities for individuals to work from home, be sure to research the company and position in advance of applying.
